Village adoption and its activities

Santosh deemed to be University has adopted 5 villages- Morta, Girdharpur Sunarsi, Basanthpur Sainthli, Matiyala Rajapur and Mehmoodpur Loni. The total population of all these villages together is approximately 1 lakh. Santosh deemed to be University has been catering to the health-related requirements of all these villages through regular community health check-up camps as well as community health awareness camps. In the year 2023, 4 camps per village have been organised and the community members have been screened for noncommunicable diseases, reproductive health issues and other common infectious diseases. Medicines are provided to the people in these camps and those needing referral are provided transport facilities for Santosh Hospital and subsidised care at the hospital.

Apart from it, activities under Santosh Poshan Yojana involving distribution of pulses and cereals are carried out to underprivileged residents of the villages. Distribution of stationary items to school children, sensitisation programs for menstrual hygiene and safe drinking water are carried out regularly under the ISR initiatives of the University- Santosh Swachh Naari Swasth Naari and Santosh Swachh Payjal Yojana. Approximately 500 sanitary pads have been distributed to underprivileged adolescent girls in these villages. 500 families have been provided with chlorine tablet bottles under Santosh Clean Drinking water initiative. Santosh Nirjalikaran Roktham Yojana (Santosh Prevention of Dehydration Scheme) is another scheme in which community members of these adopted villages are sensitised towards prevention of dehydration due to extreme heat or diarrhoea. Awareness sessions are done by students in adopted villages regarding dehydration, its signs and symptoms, and its treatment. ORS reconstitution has been demonstrated to about 500 community members and 500 ORS packets have been distributed to the attendees of the program.

In one of the adopted villages, 100 bundles of copies and pencil boxes were also distributed to the identified school students from underprivileged section of the community. Regular health educational camps involving environmental sanitation and reduction of mosquito breeding sites are undertaken. Tree plantation drives have also been carried out in the area with involvement of undergraduate students.

Family adoption programme and its activities

Family Adoption Programme has been implemented by Santosh Deemed to be University as part of MBBS curriculum from 2021-22 Batch. Till now, three batches have been allocated families in three villages as follows-

1. MBBS 2021-22-- Morta
2. MBBS 2022-23-- Duhai
3. MBBS 2023-24-- Kannauja

Each of the students has been allotted 3 families and the FAP visits are held as per the guidelines. In the 1st year, the students take the demographic data of the families and build rapport with the family members. They ask about their general health and if any health issue is identified, they in consultation with their mentors, advise the family members for visiting the Santosh Hospital. A transport is arranged for such families requiring consultation in the hospital. Each year, the students also mobilise their family members in each of the allocated batches to attend the health camps organised in the three villages. The undergraduate students also perform a thorough general examination of the available family members including anthropometry for children and infants and record it in their logbooks. They also record the details of any investigations carried out in their adopted families through camps. All these empower the student to make a diagnosis of medical conditions in the family members of the adopted families. The students through this program also sensitise the families towards general environment and sanitation measures to keep their surrounding clean and free from vectors. They have during their visits also taught the family members about how to do a digital transaction through UPI.

The students have also carried out plantation drives in these villages in coordination with the community leaders and with participation of the family members.

A total of 12 visits were carried out during the year 2023 in the three batches. In all, 1350 families have been covered by the MBBS students in the three batches.

World Down Syndrome Day – 21.03.2023

Preface:

The department of Psychiatry, Santosh Deemed to be University, Ghaziabad, NCR Delhi organised World Down Syndrome Day on 21.03.2023 (Tuesday) at 10:00 AM – 11:00 AM.

Importance of World Down Syndrome Day

Talk based on concept of providing them equality in following areas;

They are not given an excellent education.

They do not receive adequate medical attention.

They are prevented from working and generating their own income.

They aren't permitted to choose how they want to conduct their life.

Their cries go unheard!

Down syndrome

An extra chromosome causes the disorder known as Down syndrome. In the body, chromosomes are discrete "packages" of genes. They control how a baby's body develops during pregnancy and after birth, determining how it will look and work. A newborn typically has 46 chromosomes. One of these chromosomes, chromosome 21, has an extra copy in infants with Down syndrome. Trisomy is the medical word for having an extra copy of a chromosome. Trisomy 21 is another term used to describe Down syndrome (DS). The newborn may experience difficulties with their mental and physical development as a result of this additional copy, which alters how their body and brain grow.

People with Down syndrome may appear and act alike, yet each one is have different capabilities.

Prevalence (number of babies have Down syndrome in India)

SANTOSH

Deemed to be University
(Established u/s 3 of the UGC Act, 1956)

Every year, between 23,000 and 29,000 children are born in India with Down syndrome.

35 yr is cut off age considered risk factor for having such DS babies is 1 in 250 births.

Down syndrome types

The three different varieties of Down syndrome. The physical characteristics and behaviours of each kind are frequently similar, making it difficult for people to distinguish between them without looking at the chromosomes.

Trisomy 21:

Approximately 95% of Down syndrome sufferers also have Trisomy 21.2 Instead of the typical 2 copies of chromosome 21, each cell in the body in a person with this kind of Down syndrome has 3 copies.

Translocation Down syndrome:

This kind of Down syndrome only makes up about 3% of all cases of the condition. This happens when an extra chromosome 21 is present, but it is not a separate chromosome 21; rather, it is attached or "trans-located" to another chromosome.

Mosaic Down syndrome:

Around 2% of individuals with Down syndrome have mosaic Down syndrome. Mosaic is a term for mixture or combination. Some of the cells in children with mosaic Down syndrome have three copies of chromosome 21, while other cells have the standard two copies. The characteristics of other Down syndrome children may also apply to children with mosaic Down syndrome. Yet, because some (or many) of them have cells with a typical number of chromosomes, they might have fewer symptoms of the illness.

Diagnosis

Screening tests and diagnostic tests are the two main categories of testing available to identify Down syndrome during pregnancy. A screening test can inform the expectant mother and her healthcare practitioner of the likelihood of Down syndrome in the baby. Although screening tests cannot offer a definitive diagnosis, they are safer for the woman and the unborn child.

SANTOSH

Deemed to be University
(Established u/s 3 of the UGC Act, 1956)

Diagnostic tests can usually tell whether a baby will have Down syndrome or not, but they can also put the mother and growing infant at greater danger. Nobody can foresee the full effects of Down syndrome on a baby; neither screening nor diagnostic techniques can do so.

Testing Exams

Screening tests frequently combine an ultrasound, which produces a picture of the baby, with a blood test, which counts the quantity of several compounds in the mother's blood (e.g., MS-AFP, Triple Screen, Quad-screen). The fluid behind the baby's neck is one of the things the technician examines during an ultrasound. A genetic issue could be indicated by extra fluid in this area. The results of these screening tests can be used to estimate the baby's Down syndrome risk. Occasionally, screening tests may produce an abnormal result even when the baby is healthy. Even when the test findings are normal, they can still miss a problem.

Detection Tests

When a screening test results in a positive result, diagnostic testing are typically carried out to confirm the diagnosis of Down syndrome. Several diagnostic procedures include:

Chorionic villus sampling (CVS)—looks at placental tissue

Examines the amniotic fluid during amniocentesis (the fluid from the sac surrounding the baby)

Blood from the umbilical cord is examined via percutaneous umbilical blood sampling (PUBS).

These examinations check for chromosomal abnormalities that might point to a diagnosis of Down syndrome.

Additional Health Issues

SANTOSH

Deemed to be University
(Established u/s 3 of the UGC Act, 1956)

Numerous individuals with Down syndrome have the typical facial characteristics and no other significant birth abnormalities. Unfortunately, some individuals with Down syndrome may also have a number of serious birth abnormalities or other health issues. The following is a list of some of the most typical health issues that affect kids with Down syndrome. 8

Loss of hearing

When a person has obstructed sleep apnea, their breathing will occasionally stop while they are asleep.

Infected ears

Eye conditions

Birth malformations in the heart

Health professionals often check children with Down syndrome for various ailments.

Treatments

Down syndrome is a chronic illness. Early intervention services can frequently assist babies and young children with Down syndrome develop their physical and intellectual capacities. The majority of these programmes are geared towards promoting the full development of kids with Down syndrome. These treatments, which normally come under early intervention programmes in every state, include speech, occupational, and physical therapy. Despite the fact that many of them are integrated in ordinary courses, children with Down syndrome may also require additional support or attention in the classroom.

Treatment

Psychosocial treatment:

1. Family psycho-education about the diagnosis.
2. Parent management technique.
3. Behavioural shaping: in this a complex task is broken down into simple small steps. Each step should be made to practice repeatedly and learning of each step should be reinforced with positive reinforcement like praising the child for doing the task correctly and giving the items (reward) that the child likes.

Psychosocial treatment..

All family members should be involved in behavioural shaping of the child. It should be carried out at home as well as in school. Parental support and training is necessary to carry out this. This approach can be used to teach the child basic skills and activities of daily living.

4. Speech therapy: It is recommended for children who have reduced speaking ability.

Treatment

Psychosocial treatment...

5. Educational planning: special school learning for children with moderate to severe mental retardation.
6. Activity scheduling.
7. Vocational rehabilitation.
8. Getting a disability certificate.
9. Concession passes to travel in road and railway system.
10. Occupational therapy: This can be given to the child as per his/her intellectual ability.

Event Report:

CME – Mental Healthcare Act 2017

29.03.2023

Preface:

Mental Healthcare Act 2017

Postgraduate (PG) training in psychiatry started in India in 1941 and was regulated by the Medical Council of India starting in 1956. It has since changed into a more organised objective framework. In order to prepare students to become future teachers, trainers, and clinical practitioners, the majority of PG programmes mandate the submission of a dissertation in addition to clinical practise. This is done to provide students experience in organising, carrying out, and distributing research. The Mental Healthcare Act (MHCA) of 2017 requires that the training regulatory board review the curriculum in order to incorporate the requisite information, abilities, and competence of trainees. The Act increases the importance of paperwork and form completion while giving psychiatrists instructions on how to behave in specific circumstances.

Research involving patients with serious mental illness is permitted under particular conditions. The article covers the MHCA provisions that call for changes to the curriculum in order to better prepare psychiatric interns to practise within the confines of the law and to be aware of patient protections when doing research. It is the responsibility of the trainees to take the initiative and make an attempt to comprehend the practical ramifications. The best approach to learn is through mentored practise in their clinical postings. Finally, one must be aware that different people may interpret the act's provisions differently. Any interpretation of the clause is still subject to legal challenge.

SANTOSH

(Established u/s 3 of the UGC Act, 1956)

Psychiatrists' methods of practise will alter as a result of the 2017 Mental Healthcare Act (MHCA). Changes must be made at the training level as a result for the trainees to be able to practise in accordance with the legislation. While the law permits research with people who have severe mental illnesses, it has also added particular protections for such study.

Differences in the Law

Family members could request the admission of people with mental illness under the previous law, the Mental Health Act (MHA) of 1987. Family members were typically involved during assessments and reviews of progress in any healthcare setting. On the other hand, the MHCA 2017 prioritises the rights and choices of patients. The Act requires documentation and the completion of forms and directs psychiatrists to act in a specific manner in a specific circumstance.

Skills in Communication

Patient and family interaction

There is a need to give PMI and their families enough time, to communicate more openly, to improve trainees' abilities to gauge the patient's comprehension of and competence for various care-related concerns, and to ascertain the individual's preferences for treatment, including the setting. While determining the level of risk and when addressing the legal issues with the patient and family, the trainees must seek supervision and guidance from their supervisors. It is important to be aware of potential conflicts between patient preferences and those of the family.

The trainees may occasionally encounter contradictory circumstances in which they may be required to disclose decisions made to admit patients against their will and in which they may be required to deny to admit a patient at the request of their family in accordance with the law. The first thing to understand is that different circumstances may call for different types of intervention. Second, even when choosing a choice that complies with the law, the choice made may end up making the patient or their family unhappy. Such a circumstance needs to be handled cautiously, and the trainees' mentors must assist them.

SANTOSH

Deemed to be University

Written Correspondence

One must master the art of accurate recording because it could be used as proof in the event of an investigation or medicolegal dispute. Every situation should be viewed as having potential medical legal implications, and proper documentation should always be carefully considered. Any doctor, including PG trainees, may be called by the courts, review boards, or medical councils for clarifications or as a witness. For instance, even if a specific decision to act against someone's will must be recorded in writing, the trainee may be asked to come before the Review Board or Court to defend their reasoning. The trainee must be ready to explain why guidance was not requested or improperly recorded in a specific situation.

Informed Consent

The MHCA 2017's provision, which requires trainees to obtain patients' informed consent even for what may seem like regular care, will transform how practitioners operate. The students would need to practise informing patients and get their permission. It may be necessary for trainees to learn how to have conversations with patients in which, for instance, they present a selection of popular antidepressants along with a description of the typical response and adverse effects. The patient is then urged to make choices that ultimately determine the course of treatment.

The ability to make choices regarding care and treatment

The criteria for determining whether a person has the capacity to make decisions about their mental health care and treatment are outlined in Chapter II. Under supervision, trainees are most suited to implement changes in clinical practise and start evaluating capacity for a particular component. They should record the procedure, the reasoning behind their conclusion, as well as any future plans in which they may highlight the necessity for a capacity reassessment.

Advance Directive

Patients must be treated in line with a legitimate Advance Directive, according to the law (AD). Although the Act has made it the duty of the patients or their Nominated Representative (NR) to make AD documents accessible to the doctor when required, trainees seeing patients for the first time in an emergency setting or the outpatient clinic

SANTOSH

Deemed to be University

(Established u/s 3 of the UGC Act, 1956)

will still need to enquire if a person has already obtained one. The act further states that emergency treatment under section 94 may still be provided despite a valid AD in community settings that are not registered as mental health establishments. The trainees must also be aware of the difficulties associated with implementing the AD in our nation.

The Nominated representative

Patients have the option of designating a family member or even a stranger as their NR. When the patient has the capacity, the patient still takes the lead in decision-making despite the existence of NR. The provisions in this section must be understood by trainees, who should also involve the NR as needed.

Right to Information

In accordance with the right to information, patients who are admitted against their will in accordance with a specific provision of the act must be informed of the nature of their illness, the treatments available, the circumstances surrounding their admission, as well as their legal options for appealing to the relevant board. The initiative must come from the trainees, who should practise giving such information and documenting it. Also, it might be viewed as a good practise to provide written information on their type of admission, their rights, including the ability to appeal, and its procedure.

Right to confidentiality

The confidentiality of patient information is emphasised in the code of medical practise. The Act, however, outlines circumstances under which this privilege may be suspended. For instance, the least amount of information required to safeguard the patient from harm or violence to self or others or for public safety will have to be disclosed to concerned parties when a patient with mental illness poses a danger of harm to self or others due to the underlying illness. Moreover, information may need to be made available to courts or other statutory agencies. It is best for trainees to only release information when properly supervised, but they must make an effort to participate so they can learn from actual experience.

SANTOSH

Deemed to be University
(Established u/s 3 of the UGC Act, 1956)

Right to access medical records

As patients have access to their medical records, trainees must be aware that the data they include in their notes could be examined or questioned. There may be various methods of documentation. For instance, a more vivid and verbatim narrative could be used in place of interpretations such "the person is threatening suicide." A suitable description of the reported phenomenology can support an opinion that a patient is delusional or lacks insight. There may be difficulties as detailed case notes are increasingly replaced with telegraphic electronic internet documentation.
